Abstract— Age-Related hearing loss or Presbycusis is a slow, progressive hearing loss and affects both ears equally. First signs of hearing loss are inability to understand speech in noisy environments. This study includes the changes in the response of auditory filter and the hearing thresholds due to the masking sounds for elderly with hearing impaired. The hearing aid designer should come across this study before designing a suitable device not just only amplifying the sounds. The dynamic range of hearing thresholds especially for hearing impaired changes due to Masking. Therefore, to understand the speech for hearing impaired requires high SNRs due to broadening of auditory filter compared to normal hearing. To improve the SNR, it is challenging to select best noise reduction technique among plenty. This study presents number of SMNR methods to get clean speech by estimating noise from noisy speech. It is also discusses the combination of the techniques and the idea behind the techniques.

Keywords— Presbycusis; Masking; Hearing Threshold; Single Microphone Hearing Aids; Speech Intelligibility

I. INTRODUCTION

Approximately 360 million people in the world live with a debilitating hearing loss [1]. The main hearing losses are age-related and noise induced sensorineural hearing loss. Both the losses are progressive and in the future we cannot cure or reverse it. Using proper hearing aid only we can overcome this. Otherwise hearing loss people will feel difficulty in understanding speech from others. Then they will be separated from the others. While hearing aids are the most common devices to overcome this, they are widely used in well-developed countries. In United States, only 16% of adults age between 20-69 and 30% of adults of age more than 70 only could benefit from hearing aids and adoption rate is growing slowly even though technologies are advances in the field. There are several reasons for their under use, high cost, stigma. And one more main reason is that the hearing aids are not work well in noisy environments [1].

Healthy people 2020 has outlined several goals that relate to improving hearing outcomes for adults [2]. It states that the effect of untreated hearing loss cannot be ignored and early and the careful evaluation and treatment is better for longtime health and quality of life. As a solution, this study includes all the possible noise reduction techniques used in designing of low-cost hearing aids with single microphone.

II. AGE RELATED HEARING LOSS

Age related hearing loss has several reasons, mainly age, genetics, noise exposure, and chronic disease (e.g., diabetes, kidney disease, and heart disease) [2]. Due to Presbycusis first it is difficult to hear high frequency sounds, later low frequency sounds. It is difficult to diagnose this type of hearing loss in adults because people thought this as normal change due to aging.

A. Auditory filter

Auditory filter is an array of overlapping band pass filters and it is created by cochlea in the inner ear. The shape of it decides the frequency selectivity and tuning of basilar membrane. The mechanical structure of basilar membrane is narrow and stiff at the base and wide and flexible at the apex. Base is most responsive to high frequencies and apex is responsive to low frequencies.

That's why different parts of basilar membrane react and vibrate based on the frequency of the sound. The filter characteristics are in the Fig. 1. As shown in that, the shape of it for impaired ear is different from that of normal ear. For impaired ear it is flatter and broader in low frequency sides compared to that of normal ear [3]. As the outer hair cells are damaged due to presbycusis, tuning of basilar membrane is reduced i.e., frequency selectivity of auditory filter is reduced.

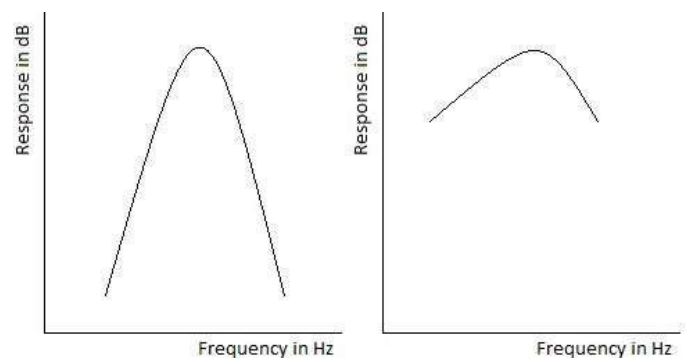

Fig. 1. Auditory filter of normal ear and impaired ear

For most of the cases the outer hair cells are damaged causes the filter broadening on the low frequency side. If both the outer and inner hair cells are damaged, then the filter is broader at all the frequencies which is less common. So the
